句子

1、 That is, in large part, because researchers have lacked the tools to conduct the large-scale population studies and randomised trials necessary to establish any definitive causal effects. This is now starting to change.

翻译：

2、 All being well, results from these studies should start coming in by the end of 2025.

翻译：

3、 But many more such studies will be needed to reach definitive conclusions about what microplastics do to human bodies.

翻译：

4、 To visualize these changes, the scientists used a metric quantifying how many new “predictions” the brain makes of words that could come next in a sentence.

翻译：

5、 The findings support the need for scientists to incorporate more diversity when crafting linguistic models, says Jixing Li, a linguist at City University Hong Kong, who was not involved in the new study.

翻译：

6、 A huge 89% majority of the world's people want stronger action to fight the climate crisis but feel trapped in a self-fulfilling “spiral of silence” because they mistakenly believe they are in a minority, research suggests.

翻译：

7、 This framework was then tested against three different parsing strategies, or linguistic models that illustrate how the brain builds information over time.

翻译：

8、 Making people aware that their pro-climate view is by far the majority could unlock a social tipping point and push leaders into the climate action urgently needed, experts say.

翻译：

9、 McLoughlin said such perception gaps could have real consequences.

翻译：

10、 “They could mean that climate policies are not as ambitious as the public sentiment.”
